Pandemic Providers

Psychologists Respond to Covid

- Includes a range of age groups
- Utilizes a whole-person approach
- Incorporates telehealth practices

Pandemic Providers could not be more timely, given the Covid-19 pandemic and those yet to come. The book's editors and chapter authors are skilled professionals who had to work their way through uncharted territories, creating a roadmap for the intrepid practitioners who are dealing not only with the current health crisis but also for those who will deal with pandemics yet to come. It is written in a lively, reader-friendly manner that allows its insights to be put to immediate use.

—Stanley Krippner, Ph.D., Affiliated Distinguished Faculty, California Institute of Integral Studies.

The sudden onset of the pandemic left many psychologists unprepared for the traumas caused by complex and new challenges. This group of psychologists, led by experts from the trauma division of the American Psychological Association, grew into a multidisciplinary group of volunteers who dedicated themselves to learning to address these challenges and to document their learning so that other healthcare providers could benefit. The result is a valuable record of those challenges and lessons learned from multiple perspectives, international affiliates, and creative new methods. The world needs caregivers who can meet the rapidly changing challenges, and this book can help teach and train others to do so. I highly recommend it for graduate students, volunteers, and healthcare providers.

—Philip G. Zimbardo, Ph.D., Professor Emeritus Psychology Stanford University.
